DEPRESSION HARD TO MANAGE FOR STUDENTS

Many parents are worried about their children's mental health. But a study by the American Psychological Association (APA) has found that depression is one of the most common mental health problems among teenagers. The study found that 13 percent of teenagers aged 13 to 18 had experienced symptoms of depression in the past year. This is a significant increase from 10 percent in 2012. The study also found that girls are more likely than boys to experience depression.

The study also found that depression can have a significant impact on a student's academic performance. Students with depression are more likely to miss school, have lower grades, and struggle to concentrate in class. In fact, the study found that students with depression are 20 percent more likely to drop out of school than those without. This is a serious concern for parents and educators alike. It is important to recognize the signs of depression and seek help for students who are struggling. There are many resources available to help students with depression, including counseling, medication, and support groups. Parents and educators should work together to provide a supportive environment for students who are struggling with depression.
